

Anglican Church of St Thomas Becket

Church of England in Hamburg.

The British Residents in Hamburg, whose former and ancient chapel was destroyed, together with the Factory, during the occupation of the city by the French, have at length, after a series of difficulties, erected a new church, for the performance of their religious rites. This has been effected by subscription raised among themselves aided by a grant from the British Government, equal to the amount of the individual contributions. But the sums collected have been already expended in the building, the exterior of which only is finished, and the interior fitting out remains to be provided for, which will occasion a further outlay of £800 or £900. — Every effort has been made by the Building Committee in Hamburg to induce the British and they are now completely earnestly to solicit the assistance of the friends of the Church in London, and of a large body of adherents in the various parts of the Kingdom, and abroad, the necessary relief may be opened in two months.
